Lan Crawler

A program written in .NET Framework with a visual interface, as well as commands accessible from the command line. Like many of you, I use the internet. My job requires me to access servers and other devices that reside on remote networks. These networks can be located as close as the office and as far away as a major corporation in another city. Because of this, I am often disconnected from the Internet when I work from home, or when I go on vacation. In the future, I hope to be able to use my home network, such as a Wireless router, as my primary connection to the Internet. Some computers (such as my home computer, laptop, or cellphone) have a modem that connects to the telephone line and converts the digital data to analog data. Once the analog data is received, the data is converted to a digital data stream that is sent to the modem. This process is typically called modulating the data. A computer network, like a telephone line, is made up of devices that send and receive data. Each device on the network has an IP address that identifies the device on the network. Network devices are identified with the IP address on the network. In this tutorial, you will learn how to configure your PC to use DHCP for IP address assignment. Using DHCP will be the best solution if you are setting up a private or public IP address on your computer. The next best option would be to use a modem, but a modem will cost you money, and is not always connected to the Internet, which can be an issue if you need to access the Internet or use a third party IP address. Internet Protocol Address (IP address) A computer's IP address is assigned to it by a device that is called a DHCP Server. When a DHCP Server assigns an IP address to a computer, that computer is able to receive information about any other computers or devices that are connected to the Internet. The IP address is a piece of information that lets your computer know what the outside world is saying. The IP address is comprised of four different parts, as follows: Network Address Subnet Mask Default Gateway DNS (Domain Name Server) Network Address The network address, or the IP address, is the address of the network that the computer will be connected to. A network address is like a street address for a computer. The network address identifies a specific computer on the network. The network address is made up of a
