Design of an Indium Selenide (InSe) Biocompatible Microphotonic Crystal for Photothermal Therapy of Cancer Cells. Cancer treatment based on photothermal therapy (PTT) remains a challenging field. We describe a two-dimensional photonic crystal composed of an amorphous InSe crystal for the first time. In contrast to the common photonic crystal composed of a single crystal, the InSe crystal can be grown continuously and continuously to form a microphotonic crystal. This enables the realization of a unique photonic crystal with a tunable optical band gap that can be used for selectively killing cancer cells. When the InSe crystal is irradiated by near-infrared light, the photonic band gap can be activated to allow the evaporation of the InSe crystal by photothermal heating. We further describe how the photonic band gap can be adjusted by changing the material parameters of the InSe crystal. The results of the PTT experiments performed in vitro indicate that cancer cells can be selectively killed by the photonic crystal with a much higher photothermal efficiency than cells without the photonic crystal. Our findings indicate that InSe crystals are a promising material for fabricating a PTT-based cancer cell-killing photonic
