Patrick, Henry L. Stimson and John F. Kennedy. But perhaps it's better known for the sheer number of beer makers in the area. To that end, today we unpack the history of the state's brewing industry and offer a sampling of some of its famous and long-gone brews. We begin with the earliest known brewing outfit in the state, built in 1834 by A. E. Dane on Plymouth Street in Providence. By 1853, the company had relocated across the river to Rhode Island's mainland, where it erected a new, permanent brewery with two small wooden gabions and a small covered porch. By 1878, Dane's was brewing one of the first commercial hard-boiled egg beers. And by 1890, the company was making an even bigger splash — at a very big price tag, to boot. The Dana brewing company, to use its full name, was started by brothers John and William H. Dana, and acquired by the W. & J. Slocum Company in the late 1890s. But that's not what first caught our attention: They bought the brewery. That they never operated it is typical of the industry. The Dana company, which produced beer for Slocum and other brewers, is a prime example of a company that prospered, but never brewed. The brewery was a money pit for the Dana family, which had borrowed heavily in order to buy the company. By the early 1900s, they were forced to sell it. The new owners, the Manchester Brewing Company, started brewing in January 1901. But Manchester's beers weren't selling well: It made only 35 barrels in its first year. So it changed tactics. The company began sponsoring the Manchester Ladies' Amateur Athletic

Category:Mafia II Every year the Japanese prime minister opens the autumn session of Parliament with the annual speech known as the "State of the Nation." His speech is broadcast live on most cable and satellite television stations and is viewed as a kind of State of the Union address for the country, as it sets out his agenda and announces the president of the year to be. Then, on October 10, he will make his biggest announcement of all. Not the date of the next general election, or his opinions on the economy or foreign policy — that will come, in good time, in the next few months. What the prime minister will say is that he is replacing the Bank of Japan governor, Haruhiko Kuroda. The current governor, who has been at the helm since 2013, is an economic pragmatist who has done a lot to stimulate Japanese growth and boost household incomes. Japan has until now had three governors since the global financial crisis, but only two were economically oriented. The third, Haruhiko Kuroda, is more of an ideologue — not that this is a bad thing, it is just a little unusual for an economy that is Japan's size, and the world's third largest, to have only three governors in its central bank. Japan's economy has been one of the strongest in the last decade, and growth is predicted to accelerate further under the conservative prime minister Shinzo Abe. But this is not just about a strong economy. Because Japan has been in deflation since 2009, when it started to fall back into a lost decade after the bubble in the late 1990s, a strong economy is all that is keeping prices stable. Many economists, including some among the Bank of Japan's staff, have judged that the governor was making the right choices: They thought, partly because of his track record in a more bullish environment in the 2000s, that his plans for further stimulus would be sound. However, last week the Bank of Japan announced it would be stopping its aggressive monetary stimulus program. The BoJ kept up its purchases of government bonds, but will be reducing its monthly buying by $10 billion, a far cry from the huge monthly injections of the past. This is largely because the economy has 1cb139a0ed
